Acheron autem dicitur quasi gaudio carens, That is, wanting joy and comfort, a river so called, that is feigned to receive the soules of the deceased, because that when men are ready to die, a certaine suddain astonishment doth so subvert the minde and understanding, that death may easily bee discerned to bee at hand: for then the conscience and memory of things that bee done, trouble the minde: which Meere, Lake, or Marsh, must first bee passed over; nor can the minde choose but bee mightily perplexed in the searching and examining of their life formerly spent. This river is sayd to be the sonne of Ceres, or the earth, because the whole trouble and vexation of the mind arisith in the care of getting and keeping of riches. This river gave drinke to the Titans fighting against Iove, because many wicked cogitations and thoughts doe arise up against the Commandements of God, which if the minde shall cherish and give way unto, hee must needs rebell against the law of God, and become in nature a beast; besides, it is sayd to be of a most bitter taste, because that when the course of our former life being called to account, must needs breed bitternesse and griefe. Vide Nat. Cyrus, Persica lingua solem significat, sicut & Heb. urn, solem coruscantem. The sonne of Cambyses by Mandane the daughter of Astyages. This Astyages king of the Medes being informed by the soothsayers, that of his daughter Mandane should bee borne a sonne that should overrule Asia, and drive him from his kingdome; married her to one Cambyses an obscure man among the Persians, purposing by that meanes to delude the prophesie; yet fearing the worst, as soone as Cyrus was born of her, he gave him to Harpagus to be slain; but he fearing the future displeasure of Mandane when she should be Queene, did not slay the child, but gave him to a shepheard, by whom he was brought up, and fulfilled the prophesie of the soothsayers. He first united the kingdoms of the Medes and Persians, overthrew the Lydians, of whom Crœsus was king; tooke Babylon, and was the first Emperour of the second chiefe Monarchy which was of the Persians, which continued 207 yeares, till Alexander the great. This is that Cyrus, whose name and power was foretold by Isaiah 45. 1. an hundred yeares before he was borne. Hee was a man admired for his Personage, Prowesse, Wisedome and Liberality, but especially for his memory: Solinus reporteth that he could call every souldier in his army by their proper name, when he spoke unto them. At last, itching after more victories he was slaine by Tomyris Queene of the Sythians, by whom his head was cut off and throwne into a vessell full of blood, with this reproachfull saying, Satiate sanguine quem sitisti. See his life discribed by Herodot. Solin. Just. & Val. Max. imper. Pers. an. mund. 3391. tot. Asiæ 3411. sic Helvi. Incepit autem Monarchia Pers. secundi. Bucholc. anno mundi 3415. Deucalion, The sonne of Prometheus who married Pyrrha daughter to Epimetheus. When hee reigned in Thessaly, came the universall flood, and drowned all the world, onely hee and his wife Pyrrha got into a ship, and it was carried into the mount Parnassus, and there stayed where the dry land first appeared: when the flood was done, he consulted with the Oracle of Themis, how mankinde might be repaired, and he was answered, if he cast his great moders bones behinde his backe: hee tooke stones the bones of his mother the earth, and cast over his shoulders, and they became men, and his wife cast stones over her shoulders backward and they became women, whence they say came λαὸς populus of λάας lapis. This deluge came onely in Greece and Italy: but by the cunning of Sathan, what was spoken of in Scripture the poets spoke of as a fable, that we might give lesse credit to Scripture, when wee seeke made but a poeticall fiction: they fained all things to have happened after Deucalions flood, as they did after the generall inundation in the dayes of Noah: that Deucalion did restore mankinde: what ever Poets dreame, the truth is, he did only cause them to climbe to the top of Parnassus, being there safe above the waters, where after the flood he taught them more civility then they had. Isaac. sic Punc. Oi they were called Druides, because they had Oracles from Okes, where Misseden growes. Certaine Magi, Priests in France that built the city Aurelia or Orleans, a colledge, ann. mundi. 2140. These were of old, the one of the two estates of France, to wit, the spirituall, to whom was committed the care of providing of sacrifices, of prescribing lawes for their Idolatrous worship, of the instruction and bringing up of their youth, of the studying of the arts, of deciding of controversies amongst the people, concerning the bounds of their ground and such like. They had Okes in great estimation, and all things that grew on them, especially Misseden, which they worshipped as a thing sent unto them from heaven. The manner of their sacrifice is thus related by one: Under an Oake whereon grew Misseden, they caused meate to bee prepared, and two white Bulls to be brought forth, whose hornes were first bounden, i. first, set in the plough. Then the Priest being clad in white did climbe up the tree, and having a bill of Gold in his hand, did shread of the Misseden. Then offered they the sacrifice, praying that the gift might be prosperous to the receivers, supposing that the beast which was barren, if it dranke of the Misseden should bee fruitfull and that it was a remedy against all poysons. It is supposed that the French borrowed this superstition from this Iland of Britaine; and Tacitus saith that they were originally in England, and thence France received them. This manner of worship (as Suetonius saith) was first prohibited in the time of Augustus, and afterward the profession was quite abolished under Claudius Cæsar. See these described by Cæs. de bel. The relation of his death, is by sundry writers thus set downe: that after his death he might be feared, he stole away from his company by night, and cast himself into the mouth of the burning mountaine Aetna, that so the people finding him no where might conceive hee was taken up into heaven, but the two pattens which were cast up againe by the vehemency of the flame, betrayed all his policy: such desperate attempts will men undertake that doe not after honour, and are often crossed with the like crosse events: hee would bee some angry and then implacable, whence the proverb in both those senses* Empedoclis simultas. Epaminondas, a noble man of Thebes, sonne of Polymnus, and a valiant man of warre, a man of singular knowledge in the philosophy which Pythagoras taught, for the practise of all morall vertues; he was admired of all men in his time, and out-strip by none: it was observed in him that hee would never lie neither in jest, nor in earnest for his owne gaine. Hee overcame the Athenians, and the Lacedæmonians, and made Thebes during his time the Empresse and cheefe city of Greece, which was both before him and after his subjection to other people. So far may the power of one noble minded prince, exceed the power of a whole common-wealth. At last in the battle at Mantinea, betweene the Thebans and the Lacedæmonians, he was wounded to death with a long speare, the head remaining still in his body, yet his life continued untill he heard that his army had the victory, then hee commanding the top of the speare to bee pulled out, said that hee had lived long enough, now to die unvanquished; and so in the great joy of his victory, his blood and soule issued out of the same wound together. At his death it was said of him, that he left onely two daughters to continue his name to posterity: the victories at Leuctra and Mantinea: v.
